emergency response team constructed a protective berm and deployed absorbent booms Sunday and this morning, trying to keep diesel oil which had leaked from a tank at the old zinc smelter plant near Sandoval from trickling into a Crooked Creek tributary.

The amount of oil spilled has now been estimated at between 1,000 and 3,000 gallons of the fluid, believed to be No. 5 diesel fuel. The puddling fluid was first noted Saturday evening by a Sandoval police officer on patrol, and Marion County Emergency Services and Disaster Agency Director John Stover later notified the IEPA.

Stover told the Sentinel yesterday that the IEPA was supposed to investigate the scene on Sunday but had not. Later in the day, he confirmed that IEPA officials had been at the scene constructing a protective earthen berm.

The federal EPA has also been called in, according to reports, and has contracted for a vacuum truck to pick up the oil later today.
